

A box-and-whisker plot is best used to show the middle of a data set, as well as the spread of the data. So it shows the data set as a whole. It does not show the data broken into numerical groups. A stem-and-leaf plot could be used to compare sizes of groups, where each group was one stem, but it is not the best type of graph for this usage.