A line graph is best used to show continuous data, such as the change in some amount over the course of time. It does not show the data broken into numerical groups, so is not good for this purpose. A histogram showing different age groups along the x-axis and the number of theater-goers along the y-axis would successfully compare the actual number of people in each of these numerical groups.