

You may have chosen this answer because there are three different colors of marbles. This would be the answer if there were an equal number of each colored marble, but there is not. To calculate the probability of this event, you must divide the number of outcomes for the event (choosing a red marble) by the total number of outcomes in the sample space (choosing any marble in the bag).